

Overview

The research conducted in this report, including the contractor safety plan, contractor safety training, and contractor safety program and its implementation, is a critical component of the overall safety program. With many firms in the industry, the research indicates that safety training and safety programs are critical to the success of the construction industry. The research also indicates that safety training and safety programs are critical to the success of the construction industry. The research also indicates that safety training and safety programs are critical to the success of the construction industry.

For more information, contact:

Jill Manjundaj, j.manjundaj@ncma.org

See abstract:

://bit.ly/2SaNR-L

Key Findings

- Leading indicators, including safety management systems and documentation, are critical to the success of the construction industry.
- Safety training and safety programs are critical to the success of the construction industry, including the implementation of OSHA standards and the reduction of injury and compensation costs.
- Practical implementation of safety management systems may be more challenging for contractors and subcontractors.
- Safety management systems should be integrated into the construction and contractor accreditation and training programs.